Quantum Shift TV has proposed a government policy that could reduce Canada's greenhouse emissions by 20%. In a short video addressed to Prime Minister Harper, organic farmer Percy Schmeiser lays out the case. Shifting existing agricultural subsidies to support sustainable farming practices could annually sequester up to 152 million tons of CO2 from the atmosphere by storing more carbon in the soil.

"If we farmers can do our important bit to solve global warming and at the same time improve people's health, we want to do that," says Schmeiser.

Research by the U.S.-based Rodale Institute found that sustainable no-till-farmed soil with winter cover crops holds up to 30% more carbon than conventional agriculture. In turn the extra carbon in the soil increases food nutrients, which could reduce healthcare costs by $5 billion. Crop yields were not affected and showed more resistance to unpredictable weather patterns.

In an unusual move, the television network has proposed government policy to the Prime Minister and has invited the general public to cast their vote via an online poll at www.quantumshift.tv "SOIL: The Secret Solution to Global Warming addresses the number one and number two concerns of Canadians: It can be executed at no extra cost, could lead to significant health care savings and provides industry with time to reduce their emissions," says the company's CEO, Hugo Bonjean.

Percy Schmeiser is the Canadian farmer who fought Monsanto to the Supreme Court over its genetically modified seeds.
